Sunday, September 01, 2008 Pretend you're a cat Every cat knows that people can't resist the softness of its fur. Give us any kind of a treat and we will purr in your face and show you our best faces. I'm thinking of adopting a new cat. It's no different from any other animal, and we don't really notice when it goes in and out. All I'd have to do is sit with it at home and feed it! Even better, I'd have to do it silently. The cat-lover whom I know (I am trying to keep it a secret) thinks I'm absolutely crazy for wanting to adopt a silent cat. I'm just not that crazy. Though I'd love to find a quiet, quiet cat, I find no such cat. I've heard that most cats choose not to live with humans because we're noisy and smelly. I have also heard that they're much happier when people are quiet and unobtrusive. I don't know if either statement is true. They certainly are not my experiences of cats and humans. So I'm going to try something different. I'm going to pretend I'm a cat. I'm going to see the world through the cat's eyes. Here are two of the rules I'm going to follow: No noise at all. Smell. Everything smells. Not even me. That's right. I'm going to be as noisy as a cat, and as fussy as one, too. I'm going to see what it's like to have a pet. And I'm going to start today. I'm going to make a mess in this room today. I'm going to make a mess in the kitchen today. I'm going to make a mess in the closet today. No one will notice. I have nothing

PGP Wants You To "UnHarden" Your Files How can I recover files that have been encrypted using PGP? First, the bad news: PGP encryption does not, and will never, provide any useful way of recovering files that have been encrypted with it. Most such files have been deliberately 'harden-protected' by the owner, so cannot be decrypted by any software (including PGP) outside of the owner's own digital key set. For example, PGP files are completely useless for anyone without the necessary key. Decode with PGP
